

Scott Klososky Introduction

General Introduction Model: Scott prefers not to have a long bio read about his past. If possible, he likes to visit with the person doing the introduction and work out a way to do a warmer hand off where just a few pieces of information are delivered and then Scott walks on stage and the introducer asks a question or two that pertain to his content, or him personally. This type of introduction lands better with most audiences.

If the introducer does not want to do this model, or just needs a few bullet points for an introduction these are provided below.

General introduction Content:

Business Accomplishments:

- Scott started Future Point of View over twenty years ago and has been a futurist and digital strategy advisor to many C-suite leaders
- Scott has built and exited successfully from three technology startups with one selling for over $115 million and another going public for over an $3billion valuation
- Scott is known for being able to find “white space” business ideas that fill needed gaps that have not been seen by others
- Scott built one of the first American companies that was co-owned by the Soviet government

Personal Highlights:

- Scott lives in Oklahoma with his wife Annette who forces him to manage a herd of deer that require bags and bags of corn every week
- Scott once rode a bull called Terminator in a rodeo in front of 7000 people and lived to tell about it
- Scott is called to help the world learn to co-exist and leverage technology in healthy ways that end up being a blessing for the human race
- Scott never dreamed of being a speaker growing up and has to remind himself before he walks onstage that he has been doing this for over 20 years!
